

THE BUILDING YEARS · 26–45

How do I carry what I've taken on?

By now the choosing has mostly been done. A trade, a place, perhaps a person; debts, dependants, a name that others rely on. The question of these years is no longer which life? but how to carry this one — and what carrying it well even means.

That sketch fits some lives and not others — people arrive here late, or twice, or never, and the load is not the same in every hand. These stages are lenses, not a timetable. Five forks define the terrain. None of them resolves; each is a tension you will hold, in your own proportions, for twenty years. The wise disagree about every one of them — which is exactly why they are worth mapping.

The road through the Building Years. Each fork glyph marks a tension mapped in this chapter — tendencies, never destinies.

FORK ONE · CARRYING AND RELEASING

Do what is yours. Release the rest.

The heaviest loads of these years — the mortgage, the marriage, the child, the work — are exactly the ones whose outcomes you least control. Voices centuries apart — some plausibly independent, one openly inheriting — keep arriving at a similar division of labour.

There are things which are within our power, and there are things which are beyond our power. Within our power are opinion, aim, desire, aversion, and, in one word, whatever affairs are our own.

— Epictetus (recorded by Arrian), Enchiridion 1 · trans. Thomas Wentworth Higginson

It is not for thee to finish the work, nor art thou free to desist therefrom

— Rabbi Tarfon, Pirkei Avot (Mishnah) 2:16 · trans. Charles Taylor (Sayings of the Jewish Fathers)

Solid lines: partial argued independence. Dashed: lineage — an idea that travelled, a different fact from one rediscovered. Convergence is robustness, not truth.

FORK ONE · THE ENGINE UNDERNEATH

The weight is partly a verdict

Underneath the division of labour sits a stranger claim: that much of what crushes is not the event but the sentence we pass on it. Marcus Aurelius, writing to himself in an army camp:

Take away thy opinion, and then there is taken away the complaint, "I have been harmed." Take away the complaint, "I have been harmed," and the harm is taken away.

— Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 4.7 (cf. 4.3: 'The universe is transformation: life is opinion') · trans. George Long

WISDOM NODE · PRUDENTIAL · CONDITIONAL

Disturbance comes from judgments about things, not from the things themselves.

Marcus Aurelius

Meditations 4.7 · text checked to Long 1862

Withdraw the opinion of harm, he tells himself, and the complaint falls with it.

Epictetus

Enchiridion · the parent claim

The judgment is listed first among the things that are ours — before impulse, before desire.

Where it bends · This is counsel for the weight you must carry anyway, not a licence to call real injuries imaginary. Taken neat, it curdles into gaslighting yourself — some complaints are true. And the strict two-way split is contested: much of life is neither ours nor not-ours, but partly influenced.

text checked to Long 1862 · one voice in this corpus — scope narrow · contested at the margin

A wisdom-node card: one claim, its voices, where it bends, and an honest trust label.

FORK TWO · AMBITION AND PEACE

The wager and the desperation

Goethe's Faust stakes his soul on never being satisfied — the moment he bids any instant linger, he is forfeit (pact-terms spoken by a complicated man whom the drama finally saves, not counsel). Thoreau and Pascal chart the other side — though their ditches differ: one is resignation wearing routine, the other a life spent preparing to live:

The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation.

— Henry David Thoreau, Walden 'Economy'

So we never live, but we hope to live; and, as we are always preparing to be happy, it is inevitable we should never be so.

— Blaise Pascal, Pensées Lafuma 47 / Sellier 80 / Brunschvicg 172 · trans. W. F. Trotter

Striving

curdles into Faust's forfeit — a life spent arriving, never living

Contentment

curdles into quiet
desperation — resignation
wearing peace's clothes

The answer is a position, moved as life moves — and the ditches have more than one shape: compulsive striving, quiet resignation, perpetual deferral.

A trade-off spectrum in equal-status colour — neither pole is the wiser one here. Both are goods; both curdle. Where you stand is a decision that tends to be re-made each decade, and this corpus holds honest voices for every position.

An older voice refuses both ditches. Facing the same restlessness, Qoheleth counsels neither wager nor surrender but the ordinary table: take honest joy in food, drink, and the work of your hands — because nothing lasts, not despite it.

Ask of your striving what it is for; ask of your peace what it is avoiding.

FORK TWO · WHAT THE STUDIES SAY ABOUT MONEY

What money does — a sketch of the findings

Schopenhauer's side of the fork claims that happiness rests on what one is, not what one has:

We have already seen, in general, that what a man is contributes much more to his happiness than what he has, or how he is regarded by others. [...] The most general survey shows us that the two foes of human happiness are pain and boredom.

— Arthur Schopenhauer, Aphorisms on the Wisdom of Life (Parerga und Paralipomena) ch. 2, 'Personality, or What a Man Is' · trans. T. Bailey Saunders

Schematic curves — the shapes illustrate the findings' direction, not plotted data. The 2023 adversarial collaboration (Killingsworth, Kahneman & Mellers): experienced well-being rises with log-income for most people, with no observed plateau; flattening appears only for an unhappy minority, and the threshold itself is contested. Causal direction remains open — a 2024 reanalysis argues the causal reading was never earned. Association, not destiny.

So the old claim survives — qualified: the association is real and rising; where it flattens is contested; and whether money causes the difference remains genuinely open. Neither money can't buy happiness nor it can — the honest sentence is longer.

FORK THREE · TIME, THE SCARCE THING

Two counsels for the same hour

These are the years in which time becomes the scarce input of everything else. Seneca's diagnosis stands at the head of the fork: it is not, he argues in On the Shortness of Life, that we are given too little time — it is that we waste so much of what we are given. Then two counsels that flatly disagree about what to do with the hour in front of you.

Seize the present

In the moment of our talking, envious time has ebb'd away. Seize the present; trust to-morrow e'en as little as you may.

— Horace, Odes (Carmina) 1.11.8 · trans. John Conington

SPEAKS TO

the postponer — the one whose real life is always scheduled for later

TRUSTS

today; almost nothing else

CURDLES INTO

a life of small immediacies that never builds anything

TAKE IT WHEN

your plans have quietly become the place you hide

Work as if deathless

To accomplish great things we must live as though we had never to die.

— Luc de Clapiers, marquis de Vauvenargues, Réflexions et maximes maxime 142 · trans. Elizabeth Lee

SPEAKS TO

the builder — work that outlasts a season needs a horizon longer than one

TRUSTS

the long arc; compounding; the unfinished

CURDLES INTO

precisely the postponement Seneca condemns

TAKE IT WHEN

the work is worth more than the mood of the week

Comparison columns. Horace and Vauvenargues cannot both be followed in the same breath. The speaks to / take it when rows are editorial prompts — this book's hypotheses, not sourced findings; choosing is still yours.

Every purchase is priced in hours of your one life — count them before you spend, on either counsel. (After Thoreau.)

FORK FOUR · THE WEIGHT THAT STRENGTHENS?

Does the load make you stronger?

One of the oldest consolations this corpus holds says the load itself teaches — printed here with its asterisk, because the evidence cuts both ways.

WISDOM NODE · CONTESTED · PRINTED WITH ITS ASTERISK

Suffering can strengthen and can teach — sometimes, for some; and self-reports of growth run ahead of what studies can measure.

Aeschylus' chorus

Agamemnon 176–183 · text checked to Smyth

Suffering as the fixed road to understanding — sung inside a cycle of vengeance that only a court, at the trilogy's end, brings to a halt.

Nietzsche

Twilight of the Idols · text checked to Ludovici · lineage from the Greeks

The blow that fails to kill can strengthen — restricted, in his own gloss, to the already-strong.

Where it bends · The chorus states a law; the trilogy complicates it — the killing stops when a court replaces vengeance. Nietzsche's maxim circulates as a universal; he wrote it as a conditional. Neither voice reached the thought independently — the philologist read the tragedian. Lineage, not convergence.

WHAT THE STUDIES ADD

- Retrospective 'growth after trauma' correlated poorly with measured change in one two-month study of 122 US students (Frazier 2009; grade B/C) — a measurement caution, not a verdict on every survivor's report.
- Across 54 studies of varied stressors, the most common trajectory was resilience — staying near baseline as each study defined it — not growth and not collapse (~66%; Galatzer-Levy 2018).

texts checked (Smyth · Ludovici) · claim contested — the evidence cuts both ways · print only with this asterisk

FORK FIVE · THE HELP THAT FREES

Raising others without owning them

The Building Years are the raising years.

Two voices, eight centuries apart — a shared scriptural background is possible, but no documented link joins them — both refuse the easy, warm-feeling gift, though they aim at different targets.

There are eight levels of tzedakah, each one greater than the other. The greatest level, higher than all the rest, is to fortify a fellow Jew and give him a gift, a loan, form with him a partnership, or find work for him, until he is strong enough so that he does not need to ask others [for sustenance].

— Maimonides (Moses ben Maimon), Mishneh Torah, Hilkhoh Mattenot Aniyim 10:7 · trans. Joseph B. Meszler (Gifts for the Poor, Williamsburg VA, 2003; via Sefaria, licence CC-BY) love in action is a harsh and dreadful thing compared with love in dreams. ... active love is labor and fortitude, and for some people too, perhaps, a complete science.

— Fyodor Dostoevsky, The Brothers Karamazov Book II, ch. 4 'A Lady of Little Faith' (Zosima to Madame Khokhlakova; Garnett spells her 'Hohlakov') · trans. Constance Garnett

Maimonides ranks the gift that strengthens — the loan, the partnership, the job that ends the asking — above every warmer-feeling kind; anonymity marks a separate rung below.

Zosima aims elsewhere: at the giver's endurance — love as labour sustained without applause, against the quick, admired deeds of love in dreams.

An analogy joins them — both refuse help that flatters the helper — but they are cousins, not one claim, and they test your help in two different places.

Two tests for your help: what it leaves the other able to do — and what it asks of you when nobody claps.

THE BUILDING YEARS · A QUIET CLOSE

The unhistoric years

Most of what these two decades build will never be visible. No map of a life should pretend otherwise — or pretend it matters less for that. George Eliot, closing Middlemarch over a heroine the world never heard of:

But the effect of her being on those around her was incalculably diffusive: for the growing good of the world is partly dependent on unhistoric acts; and that things are not so ill with you and me as they might have been, is half owing to the number who lived faithfully a hidden life, and rest in unvisited tombs.

— George Eliot, Middlemarch Finale (final sentence)

She meant it as consolation, and perhaps as protest; the novel holds both readings open, and so does this book. To this book's editorial eye — a judgment, not a finding — it is the Building Years' truest sentence: the work was not required to be finished, and it was not put down.